HARVARD'S TRICK PLAY

In Practice it Has Worked Well—The Play Described.

Harvard has developed a new trick play. It had its inception in the strategic brain of Captain Daly, and he is much elated over the way it has worked against the scrubs. On the defense the ends lay away out, in order to head any runner in their section toward the center. It is almost an impossibility to get a runner past good end, and any runner that will get the end out of the play is eagerly welcomed.

Captain Daly's plan is to have both ends on the side having possession of the ball line-up in front of the opposing end. As soon as the ball is passed back for a run these two players close around the solitary man on defense and "box him out" of the play. This is a comparatively easy matter. As the runner comes toward the ball comes tearing round that end he has no one to stop him and should make a few yards before being overhauled.

The beauty of this trick play, however, is that it can be worked in two ways. When the opposing captain sees his ends kept out of the play in this manner he is very likely to take a man from the line somewhere to reinforce the end position. Here is where the nicety of the play comes in. Wherever there is a man taken away to help the end, there is the spot where the next attack will be made, and not out at the end. The line, temporarily weakened by the absence of a player, becomes the weakest point in the team, and, as such, the logical point of attack.

Class Game at Bethany.

Yesterday afternoon the seniors and sophomores of Bethany college lined up against the juniors and freshmen in a football game, and as the "varsity" was about equally divided a close game was the result. After ten minutes of fast playing the seniors and sophomores made a touch-down, Coach Sweeney carrying the ball over the line. No further scores were made in the first half. In the second half the seniors and sophomores scored again, making the final score 12 to 0 in favor of the seniors and sophomores. Light practice will be indulged in this afternoon by the "varsity" in preparation for Saturday's game. The line-up of both teams will be printed to-morrow.

ONLY THE PORTER.

Officer's Zealous and Eager Eye Led Him on a False Scent.

It was shortly after 12 o'clock Wednesday night. There was a cold and clammy stillness in the air that gave premonition of impending calamity. Officer Driehorst, with a Sherlock Holmes perspicacity, was placidly patrolling his beat. Suddenly in the dim shadow in front of Killeve's saloon, on Market street, the form of a man was seen in silhouette against the sombre background of the night.

The man surreptitiously lifted the cellar-door of Mrs. Killeve's saloon, cast a few furtive glances about him and then entered the cellar, closing the door after him. With a mental resolve to land the prowler, Officer Driehorst descended into the cavernous depths of the cellar, and without the least fear, and in the face of almost sure death, struck a match, and found himself standing face to face with George Washington, the ebony-hued porter, who had forgotten his key, and used this means of gaining ingress to the building.
